FILM: "EYES ON THE PRIZE: TWO SOCIETIES: 1965-1968"
12 p.m. Roesch Library

Martin Luther King, Jr. and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) come north to help Chicago's civil rights leaders in their nonviolent struggle against segregated housing. Their efforts pit them against Chicago's powerful mayor, Richard Daley. When a series of marches through all-white neighborhoods draws violence, King and Daley negotiate with mixed results. In Detroit, a police raid in a black neighborhood sparks an urban uprising that lasts five days, leaving 43 people dead. The Kerner Commission finds that America is becoming "two societies, one black, one white, separate and unequal." President Lyndon Johnson, who appointed the commission, ignores the report.

EXHIBIT: PICTURING MORAL COURAGE

During Roesch Library hours in Roesch Library Gallery

They come from different countries and different times: the Holocausts in Europe, Rwanda, Cambodia, and Bosnia and Herzegovina. For many, this is the first time they have told their stories, and for some, risked their lives again in the telling. The people you will see and read about in the "Picturing Moral Courage: The Rescuers" exhibition represent all walks of life. They are farmers, taxi drivers, nuns, mothers, fathers. They risked everything to save neighbors, friends and strangers. What led them to act in the way they did? Why did they risk their lives to help those being persecuted by their own?

This exhibit is designed to raise awareness of the need to stand up to injustices that are still happening in the world around us, and to contribute to the understanding of peace. We hope these provocative stories will inspire viewers to think about the courageous choices that can be made every day and become "rescuers" in their own communities wherever injustice exists.
