International Protection of Human Rights
Spring 1997

A recent graduate of the University of Dayton Law School, you are an international human rights legal specialist at a Washington D.C. public policy foundation or "think tank." One day, the Executive Director of the foundation informs you that a recent decision of the Board of Directors calls for preparation of a "position paper" or publication suggesting improvements in all aspects of United States foreign policy relating to the entire Southeast Asia basin, including mainland China.

You are thus directed to prepare a memo suggesting a new overarching U.S. human rights foreign policy for that area, including means of implementation by both the public and private sectors, anticipated problems of implementation both here and abroad, and the realistic possibilities of its success.

GOOD LUCK!
